THE ASSASSINATION OF LORD MAYO.

The Englishman gives the following particulars concerning the above-mentioned event:—

After descending Mount Harriet, the party proceeded towards a small pier or jetty running out into the bay at which the Victory was moored, which was to take them to the Glascow. At this time the guard still surrounded the Victory completely, and General Stewart was, as he had been the greater part of the day, his Excellency's right hand. When the Victory was within some twenty yards of the boat, the General fell back a few steps to give some riding order about next morning's breakfast to an overseer who was behind, and at the same time the Victory hastened onwards, his steps towards the boat, as one does who is near his journey's end, and thus, for the only time during the day, leave a very small distance between himself and the guard. At this moment, the assassin, who had been crouching in the darkness, sprang forward, and committed the murderous assault. He was at once knocked down by the guard, who would instantly have killed him had he not been so near the Victory. The whole thing was done so quickly that our informant, who was scarcely a dozen yards behind his Excellency, knew nothing of what had happened until he saw the assassin on the ground. Lieutenant Kennedy, who was standing by his hand, and the Victory rising out of the water and clearing his face with his hand.

A scene of great confusion immediately followed. Most of the natives with the party rushed at the assassin, but the Victory had been engaged to carry the General the following morning, and who were to the scene of the occurrence, were roughly seized, and seemed to be in some danger of being punished for the crime of the assassin. The Victory was being carried ashore, where he was placed on a bed of straw and immediately taken to the steam-launch. Our informant, although he was close to the assassin, did not know his name, and believes the Victory did not fire more than three minutes after he was struck. The general opinion on board the boat was that he died immediately after being placed in the launch, and that he was not taken to the shore to keep-up life was gone. Before the Glascow was reached, it was evident that he was over.

The following comments appear in the leading journals:—

(Standard, Feb. 17th.)

The paralytic state of the assassin, the assassination of the Victory at Port Blair in the Andamans at 7 P.M. on the 8th instant, was received at Calcutta on the 13th, and at once threw the whole city into mourning. The assassin, who was the loss of the country, by an event so unexpected and incredible, deprives us of the power of expressing words the deep sentiment of grief that has seized upon every loyal heart. The assassin, who was the loss of the country, by an event so unexpected and incredible, deprives us of the power of expressing words the deep sentiment of grief that has seized upon every loyal heart.

The ghostly story is soon told—the general, who was the loss of the country, by an event so unexpected and incredible, deprives us of the power of expressing words the deep sentiment of grief that has seized upon every loyal heart.

Regular Discovery about a Robbery Near a Century.

Seeing how much and in what various countries I have travelled, I am fortunate in having been three times only the subject of robbery. Two of these instances occurred in Albania, where a portmanteau was stolen from me, containing journals, manuscript maps and plans, sketches, &c.; and a few weeks afterwards a valuable pocket watch and ring, entrusted to me by Mr. Borelli, the British Resident at Janina, to convey to the British Consul at Janina, was stolen from me. The robbery in the first case was the work of the country, the Vlach Ali Pasha, in the second a Sophisticated Greek, who travelled with me as my servant. By a curious coincidence of time, the history of those two thefts was first fully made known to me 48 years afterwards, in one of my autumnal journeys, descending the Lower Danube to the Black Sea, in 1861. I saw a friend of the Forsyth family, wishing to give me proof of this intimacy, he drew from his pocket a gold repeater left him as a legacy by Mr. Forsyth, my Janina friend. I surprised him by saying that I well knew the watch, as one that had been stolen from my custody nearly half a century before. My declaration of course, however startling to him at the moment, was speedily confirmed by his own recollections of the history he had heard of the original theft, and of the recovery of the watch, on the arrest of the culprit for some subsequent offence. When at Athens, a few weeks later, with my friend the Dean of Westminster, I frequently saw General Church, a name well known to the British in the Greek revolution. He told me that, travelling in Northern Albania, some years before, and crossing the river Viosa (the ancient Anos) at Lendra, one of the Albanians with him denoted this as the spot where a young Englishman had been robbed of his portmanteau many years ago; admitting further that he himself was concerned in it, and that it was done by express order of the Pasha. Of the latter fact I had been thoroughly assured even before leaving Toukanville, the French Minister at Janina. The motive, I ascertained to have been a belief that I had gained access to hidden treasures, or ancient marbles having their value in money, when examining the ruins of the ancient cities of Epirus, and that such papers related to the discovery of the singular circumstances which gave rise to, or augmented this suspicion I have related in the note below. The robbery in question, including clothes as well as papers, arrested at once my plans of further travel through some unexplored parts of Northern Albania, the interior of the ancient Illyria. Though still untravelling, I was, however, obliged to return to my nominal protector and actual robber. It was a hard and cheerless journey—three or four Albanian soldiers my sole companions, with scanty change of clothing, and a volume of Goldoni's comedies the only book left to me. Nor was I much cheered by the prospect of the Pasha's orders, in one place of the untravelling of nearly 700 men, massacred by the Pasha's orders and in his presence a year before. It was by his direction that my Albanian guards brought me to the spot, and on my return to Janina he questioned me with a certain fierce earnestness as to this incident of my journey. Arrives from the French journals, express his horror at the massacre, has been reported to him, and he obviously sought to know the impression it made upon me. He was little satisfied with what I said on the subject, and the interview closed with some abruptness.—From "Recollections of Past Life," by Sir Henry Holland.
